Building Gender Transformative Programs

Kathleen Lahey, Professor and Queen's National Scholar, Faculty of Law, Queen's University

We use the GBA+ process to review government policies, programs, legislation and regulations. It is our way of ensuring that what we are doing actually benefits all members of society taking into account the diverse population that is Canada. This may be giant strides forward compared to not reviewing policies for gender differences at all, but is it the best we can do? Let's consider:

- How whole-of-government and departmental approaches can help guide long term and deeply substantive policy impact
- Analysis as to priorities, impacts on men as well as women, intersecting identities, plans, and budgets
- Programs intended to close all gender-related gaps more proactively and deliberately
- Achieve genuine equality for all over the course of a life-time.

Case Studies: A Feminist Approach to Gender Equality Analysis and Monitoring, Evaluation and Learning (MEL) of International Programs

Deborah Simpson, Manager of Program Impact, International Programs, Oxfam Canada

At the heart of feminist GE analysis and feminist MEL is the commitment towards feminist values and the desire to understand how change happens, what works, and how gender relations can be shifted. The feminist GE analysis and MEL process begins with an action – the choice to undertake a feminist process and the realization that the participation in this approach is a form of power. It is about the inclusion of voices not often heard. To that end, this presentation will explore:

- Oxfam’s experience and approach in feminist GE analysis and feminist MEL – key principles
- Lessons learned and best practices stemming from programs
- How to best ensure the approach is intersectional and inclusive of most marginalized groups
- Ethical and safety considerations
- Data and evidence
