Evolving Expectations on Board Oversight- Elevating Purpose & ESG on the Board Agenda

Louise Champoux-Paillé, C.M., C.Q. F.Adm.A. ASC, MBA, Économist, Executive in Residence, John Molson School of Business

Coro Strandberg, President, Strandberg Consulting, Faculty Member, Governance Professionals of Canada, Corporate Director, BC Lotteries Corporation

Over the past few years, we've seen environmental, social and governance issues gain importance in the boardroom, driven by shareholders and rising stakeholder expectations. Increasingly boards see ESG as an opportunity to improve long term value creation and not a simple check-the-box exercise. Companies are expected to play a stronger role in society. Yet, it is not clear how to navigate these issues at the board table.

We will review these trends by looking at:

- ESG competencies that will increasingly be required of directors
- Including ESG in risk management, strategy and executive compensation
- Board oversight of the company's purpose and stakeholder relations and how to get started

Materiality Matters: How to Prioritize ESG to Strengthen Your Management Approach and Disclosure

Wesley Gee, Director of Sustainability, Works Design

Carrie Christopher, ESG Director, Splunk, Inc.

Defining an organization's sustainability priorities is often determined by conducting a materiality assessment, which can involve a combination of industry research, stakeholder engagement and executive and Board consultation.

- But how can it be conducted in a way that will support an organization's governance and strategic roadmap, in addition to strengthening its performance measurement and corporate reporting?
- And what role is data playing when knowing the nuances is increasingly important?

This session will bring together seasoned sustainability executives to present their experiences in materiality, to share what they have learned, where they believe this space is evolving, and how organizations can make the most of an assessment - to build the case for positive change.

How Technology Can Help You Identify ESG Risk and Opportunity

Donato Calace, VP of Accounts and Innovation, Datamaran

Roxanne Sharif, Account Manager, Datamaran

Stakeholders and decision makers increasingly want to understand companies' ESG impacts, and with this comes a demand for robust data on external and emerging risks, ensuring greater accuracy, credibility and timeliness of the data. Technology is essential to support these processes.

By determining what is material you can manage emerging ESG risks robustly, direct resources and prepare strategies for the longer run, ensure investors and stakeholders have the information they need, and respond quickly to regulatory and reporting changes. Ultimately, this helps to improve internal processes across ESG, finance and risk teams, as well as engagement with the Board as they demand more information from management.
